One day a young fisherman trys his luck on the bank of a stream. Under the water the worm on his hood has a lot of fun tantilizing a fish who come to bite. After a few tilts the fish is caught on the hook and the fisherman draws up his line and puts the captive in the basket. A cat who has been watching the fisherman from behind a rock sneaks up. He takes the fish out of the basket and throws it into the river again. The splash causes the fisherman to look toward the cat and upon opening his basket he finds the fish gone. Becoming suspicious of the cat, he throws a stone at him and the cat runs away. The fisherman continues fishing. Down on Main Street on the river bed a mother fish pushes her baby carriage bearing her little swordfish. While she is in conversation with a cop, the baby swordfish bites at the fisherman's bait and is caught. He is drawn up and put in the basket. Again the cat comes on the scene and rescues the baby fish. As the cat is about to drop the fish into the water the little swordfish thanks him, promising to reciprocate the kindness if given an opportunity. This time the fisherman becomes infuriated at the actions of the cat, drops his tackle and gives chase. As the chase continues, time passes - 5,10,15 and finally we see twenty years after, with the fisherman now a bearded old man. Finally the man catches the cat and tying a rock to his neck throws him into the river. Just about this time the swordfish, now grown to maturity, is having his sword sharpened. He hears the noise of the cat's splash and finding his benefactor on the river bed, he cuts the ropes with his sword. The cat rises to the surface and rides ashore on the back of the swordfish. At the bank the cat and the fish embrace in fond farewell.

From this fable we learn that "One good turn deserves another".
